Question: Is there any way to see what is (or isn't) configured to provide sound on a particular device on the target machine? A: Is there any way to see what is (or isn't) configured to provide sound on a particular device on the target machine? Unfortunately, no. There is no out-of-the-box way to look for this kind of information. To see what is configured for your target machine, you need to do some OS stuff. No supported Linux tool can look at this information and provide a user-friendly way of doing it. You can get a copy of the target's current /proc/asound/cards and look at it yourself. You may also be able to grab the corresponding files from /etc/asound.conf (if the supported Linux tool supports that). You can then look at the files to see what is currently in use. Unfortunately, this won't help you find what is not being used. This is pretty much a no-can-do. You'll have to figure it out yourself. And likely, have to do this for every machine and every application you are supporting. PolitiScoop: On a Finale Note It's all over but
